must, differently expressed, 1, by gerundive = a necessity inferred from the circumstances of the case, e.g. people, we, you, etc. — die, morendum est; one — confess that every living creature is mortal, confendum est omne animal esse mortale; the person by which a thing is to be done in the dative, very seldom by ab, and only when a second dative would make the meaning ambiguous and obscure; e.g. everyone — use his own judgment, suo cuiusque iudicio utendum est; the property of many citizens is at stake; of which you — take every care, agatur bona multorum civium, quibus a vobis consulendum est (here a vobis on account of quibus, Cic., who in another passage has also two datives with the gerundive); we — take the same road, haec via (nobis) ingredienda; one — know nature, novenda est natura; the speaker — consider three points, tria videnda sunt oratori; 2, by oportet (impersonal dei, expressing a necessity inferred from reason, or from the law, or from prudence or justice), with the accus. and infin., or merely with the subjunctive mood; 3, by debere (debeamus), to express a moral obligation, e.g. you — honour him like your father, cum patris loco colere debes; if we were affected in seeing the misery of our allies, what — we now do when we see our own blood shed? sociorum miserid commovebamur, quid nunc in nostro sanguine facere debemus? Debere, therefore, is nearly = officium, so that we can also express — by officium est alci and simply est alci, e.g. a stranger — mind only his own affairs, peregrini officium est (i.e. peregrinus debet) nihil praeter suum negotium agere; a good orator — have heard much, est boni oratoris (i.e. bonus orator debet) multa auribus accipere. Officium is gen. left out in 1, you —, meum, tuum, vestrum est; 4, by putare and existimare, in the rhetorical style, as a form of politeness, so that the hearers may be allowed to come to a conclusion themselves about a point, e.g. you see to what a pitch the republic — proceed, videte quem in locum rempublicam pervertiturum putatis; 5, by opus est (impersonal dei), in speaking of any event subjectively felt, and from the supplying of which we expect great advantages; either with accus. and infin., or if the person who — do, etc., a thing is added in the dative, ut with subjunctive mood, e.g. if anything should happen which you — know (which it is useful for you to know), I'll write to you, ut quid erit, quod te scribere opus est, scribam; I — go and wash myself, mihi opus est ut lavem. Also, I — have so and so may be rendered by mihi opus est, either impersonally with abl., or personally with the nominative of the person or thing that — be had, e.g. we — have a guide, dux et auctor nobis opus est; we — use your authority, auctoritate tua nobis opus est; 3, by necesse est (impersonal, ἀνάγκη ἐστι), expressing necessity, either with accus. and infin., or simply with subjunctive mood, e.g. this mortal frame of ours — (necessarily) perish some time, corpus mortale aliquo tempore perire necesse est; 7, by facere non possum, or simply non possum with quin, etc., or feri non potest with ut non, etc., or non possum non with infin., to express what cannot be avoided, inward necessity, e.g. I — exclaim, non possum quin exclamem; 8, simply by the verb: in the indicative, inasmuch as in Latin we often leave it for the reader to supply in his own mind under what circumstances an action took place, e.g., I — confess, confiteor (Ter.), fateor (Cic.); I — regret, doleo (Cic.); I — express my surprise, miror (Liv.); this one thing I — remark, unum illud dico; in the subjunctive, if we only speak of a supposed necessity, e.g. a circumstance, at which not only all educated people, but even savages — blush, o rem dignam, in qua non modo docti, verum etiam agrestes erubescant; 9, you — (as urgent appeal), either simply by the imperative mood, or by fac ut, e.g. if you are not satisfied with that, you — accuse your own injustice, haec si vobis non probabuntur, vestram iniquitatem accusate; you — not (as an urgent warning, not to a thing), fac ne, etc. (= mind that not, etc.), cave ne (= take care lest, or not to, etc.), noli with infin., e.g. you — not wish, cave ne cupias.

Who. III. conj. to connect the main clause: A, when the sentence with — contains the subject of the copula in the main sentence; 1, when the sentence with — conveys a general idea, render by the inf., e.g. efficit est, etc., or by another noun, e.g. nihil suavius est quam amari or amor, = nothing is more pleasing than — one should be loved; 2, use the accus. and inf., after "it is pleasing, grievous, probable, clear, manifest, evident, true, it appears, it is useful, right, reasonable, necessary, lawful, it is allowed —"; after several of these impersonal verbs, use also quod and ut, see under C and D (e.g. it is pleasing to hear — you are well, gratum est te valere); 3, than —, as —, inf. with an adv. or another noun with an adj. or part., e.g. nulla res tanto erat damno, etc., quam (a noun with an adj. or part.). B, when the sentence with — contains the object of the verb of the main clause, use acc. and inf.; 1, this is the case after all verbs sensuum et affectuum, to which belong also "to know, conceive, remind, expect, hope, fear, believe," etc.; then also after fac, when it is = aspice, fancy —, etc., fac qui ego sum esse te; after the verbs "to hope, swear, promise, threaten," we use the accus. and fut. inf., only after "to hope" we use the accus. and praes. inf., when we speak of anything referring to the present time, and the accus. and perf. inf., when we speak of anything past; 2, after the so-called verba declarandi, as "to say, tell, indicate, remember, convince, teach, prove (efficere)," etc.; 3, also after "to fix, determine, wish, forbid, impose, concede (that anything is so)," etc., the inf., if the sentence with — declares the object, whilst if it contains a wish or intention, we use ut; after "they," "the people say," "it is reported," etc. (dicunt, tradunt, serunt, produnt, perhibent), either by accus. and inf., or the nom. and indie. (of the passive voice), e.g. dicunt Romulum primum regem Romanorum fuisse, or Romulus primus rex Romanorum fuisse dicebatur; dicunt vos adfuisse, or vos dicebantur adfuisse; after dubito, in the sense "I doubt not," we find in Cic. always quia. C, when the sentence with — contains a description of anything or a circumst., 1, of the subject, when we can put "which" instead of "—," by quod, as after "there is reason," or "there is no reason," (which, etc.), est (habeo), non est, nihil est quod (we may also use cur, as in English); also after "it is pleasing, rejoicing, I am glad, it is painful," etc. (e.g. nihil est quod [i.e. illud quod] timeas); also after "we must add (eo or huc acceditis)," where we use quod when we speak of a matter of fact, and ut when we refer to anything that is only in progress, always when the thing is only about to happen; 2, of the object when — = "because," also by quod after "to be glad, rejoice (gaudere)" to feel sorry, grieve (dolere), to wonder (mirari)," etc., where we use quod when we speak of a definite fact, but ut, if we speak of something merely imaginary or as we suppose it; 3, when — stands for "inasmuch as," insofar as. D, always ut or qui (quae, quod) when the sentence with — expresses the purpose, condition, aim, effect, surmise, permission, encouragement, wish or command, as subject or object, or as additional clause; after is sum, non is sum, talis, qualis, is (such a one), ejusmodi, etc.; also qui, etc. (ut is, etc.), after tam, tantus, generally after negations, after quis and after comparatives with quam, when these words express the degree, measure, up to which anything is said to possess a certain quality; and after nouns to express a purpose (e.g. Caesar sent messengers — they might say, Caesar nuntios misit qui dicerent); but ut is, etc., to express result; — not, after "to fear, to be afraid," etc., ne non, seldom ut, and — alone, ne; only — not, — by any means, ut ne (ne being placed before — which is prevented), e.g. ut hoc ne facerem (= he took care —, etc.); I say . . . not, etc., by nego with accus. and infin., e.g. he asserts — there are no gods, deos esse negat. E, — in exclamations, I, when we express a wish, oh — ut! utinam! o si (see Oh); God grant — etc., facit Deus, ut, etc.; — not! utinam ne! 2, in general exclamations, by accus. and infin. (which apparently is not governed by any preceding verb), e.g. me miserum! te in tantas aerumnas propter me incidisse!
